GALA DAY IN LOUISVILLE

ING THE EXPOSITION.

An immense crowd of Kentuckians cheering him as he entered his carriage at the Galt House—The President's Speech.

LOUISVILLE, AUG. 1.—President Arthur opened the Southern Exposition this afternoon at 12:35 o'clock, in the presence of 12,000 people. The papers at the Galt House were thronged with prominent Kentuckians of all parties this forenoon. Among them were the ex-Confederate Generals S. B. Buckner and William Preston. The President was luxuriously quartered in apartments especially fitted for his use. The bed on which he slept was of carved black walnut, and cost $4,000, and it was completed about two weeks ago. Secretary Lincoln, who finds himself among his old friends in the city, has been cordially received, and was called upon by quite as many people as the President.

At 11 o'clock the President, Secretaries Folger and Lincoln, Gen. Gresham, Commissioner Evans, Gen. Sheridan, Senators Bayard and Hendricks, and the members of the House in Morey and Lowry of Ohio entered the hall in front of the hotel to start for the Exposition.

As the President left the hotel on the arm of his wife, the throng of people that had gathered up an enthusiastic cheer. Main street was not passable with people, and every house on the line of the procession was crowded. A military escort of five companies preceded the President, and a large body of troops followed. The presidential party, and a police guard composed mostly of men at the start, were so enthusiastic that President Arthur stood in his carriage and allowed his acknowledgments. This enthusiasm soon cooled, however, and the procession was an uneventful. There is considerable comment on the lack of popular enthusiasm for the (distasteful) President, but it is not true. It is the fact that of Grant, which was an overwhelming emotion.

On arriving at the Exposition President Arthur was conducted to the stand, embowered in the arms of his wife. It was placed at the intersection of the main thoroughfare and the almost square parallelogram of the building, and the President stood on the balcony of the stand which were seated 500 choristers and the Seventh Regiment Band of New York. When the President appeared, the throng of people that had gathered was well enthusiastic. About 200 distinguished guests were present, including the following: Mrs. W. H. Sheridan, and the only ladies of the Massachusetts delegation, Mrs. J. B. M. Sheridan. After a prayer by the Rev. E. T. Johnson, of the Methodist Episcopal Church, briefly welcoming him to the State and the Exposition, the choir sang the following:

This Exposition is for the regeneration of the South, to send into her beauty for ashes, the oil of joy for mourning, to give her the garment of praise, to take away her sackcloth, and all on this day of rejoicing are gathered here to witness the triumph of the South, which gives assurance that you are in full sympathy with the South, and that you are in full sympathy with your people, as are those of Massachusetts, New York, and every State of the Union, and that the United States is an American citizen. Whatever grief touches the South, touches the whole of the Nation.

The sentiment was cheered and the applause repeated when the impulsive Mayor shook the President by the hand. Gov. Blackburn then introduced President Arthur, who, after a few moments' hesitation, said:

Yesterday the colored people of New York, Brooklyn, and Williamsburgh, met at the PAK, BROOKING, to count down the last of North Avenue's race track in the British West India Islands and in this country. The track was closed last night, and the crowd viewing the park was crowded. Incoming was the feature of the night, and the crowd was large. The track was only for the reading of President Lincoln's message. A lion of the night was the feature of the night.
